Foreword

THIS is the first directory of its kind to be published by the Departments of Animal and Dairy Husbandry of the Maryland State College. It has been collected with the idea of providing a roster of the breeders of pure-bred livestock in the State.

This list has been compiled from information furnished by the different breed associations, county agents, and by direct correspondence with the different breeders and others and is as complete as it has been possible to make it. Any corrections or changes will be gratefully received at any time.

If there are any omissions, such were not intended, and the Departments will appreciate it if such errors are brought to their attention in order that future lists may be more complete.

The names of all breeders who are or were members of the various breed associations are included within the roster. It is believed, even with its shortcomings, that this directory will supply a want among livestock breeders not heretofore met.

AUG 3 1939

Introduction

THE topography of Maryland, together with the configuration of the land and water, gives to the state a great variety of soil and climate. Associated with these various soil and climatic conditions, we find a varied type of farming. With all types of general farming and most types of special farming within the state some type of livestock husbandry does or should exist.

The means of transportation within the state are of the best. The railroads, steamship and steamboat lines, and trolley lines, operating within the state offer an easy and cheap means of transportation to all parts of the state for all kinds of agricultural products.

Washington, with a population of over three hundred and fifty thousand, and Baltimore, with a population of over six hundred thousand, together with Philadelphia, which has a population of over one million seven hundred thousand, afford excellent markets for agricultural products. New York and Wilmington are also offer good shipping facilities.

Therefore, because of the soil, climate and crop conditions, existent throughout the state; and because of the extraordinary markets with their ready means of access, Maryland is admirably and peculiarly adapted to the production of livestock. The predominating type of livestock kept will, of course, vary with the peculiar adaptations of each section of the state. The livestock interests of the state are susceptible of great improvement in quality and of marked expansion in volume. More and better farm animals should be maintained.

In making the statement that the livestock industry of the state is capable of marked increase in volume it is not the thought of the writers that everyone should keep stock or that those now maintaining herds should make large additions to the animals already kept. Rather it is maintained that it is advisable under many conditions for the livestock breeder of the state to become slightly more intensive along the line of their particular livestock enterprises. Also it is felt that livestock of one type or another could and should be maintained on many farms throughout the state where no animals now are kept. By becoming slightly more intensive and by increasing the total volume of their livestock enterprises, the farms of the State of Maryland will become better balanced and profits to their owners be increased.

The quality of all classes of animals upon the farm may be greatly improved. This statement holds true whether the animals in question yield some product such as milk or wool or whether the ultimate value of the animal lies in the carcass which it produces or the labor which it yields.

All improvements in livestock rest upon three broad, general principles, first, the breeding; second the selection; and third the feeding. While improved breeding alone, proper selection alone, or better methods of feeding alone, may result in some improvement, it is only by the strictest adherence to all of these factors that the best results can be secured and maintained.

It should be the ultimate aim of every livestock breeder to have a purebred herd or flock of high merit. If one is not possessed of purebred individuals or cannot afford to purchase such, that fact should not deter him from using such females as he may have on hand nor should it prevent him from purchasing as good females as he can afford. These females should be bred to a purebred male with as strong a pedigree and as high individual merit as circumstances will afford. Such a system of breeding is known as grading, and this is the system of improvement to be recommended in the majority of cases. If a purebred male of the same breed is used upon the females of successive generations the progeny rapidly assume the form, qualities and characteristics of the breed of which the sire is a representative. The following table illustrates the rapidity with which improved blood appears and unimproved blood disappears in the grading process:

Generation.	Dams % Purity.	Offspring % purity.	Offspring % impurity.
1	0	50	50
2	50	75	25
3	75	87.5	12.5
4	87.5	93.75	6.25
5	93.75	96.87	3.13
6	96.87	98.44	1.56

By reference to the above table it will be seen that by the time the fourth generation has been reached the progeny carry 93.75 per cent. of the blood of the breed which the purebred sire represents. Such high grade individuals are, in many instances, the equal of pure-breds in all respects except for breeding purposes. Grades from the standpoint of reproduction are not equal to purebreds, and if continued improvement is to be secured nothing but purebred males should be placed at the head of the herd or flock. The use of a grade sire prevents the further intensification of blood and all that one can hope to accomplish is to maintain the advantage already secured.

Gradually during the grading up process, a few purebred females of the same breed as the sire may be added to the herd or flock, and these will form a nucleus around which a purebred herd or flock may ultimately be developed.

By following an approved method of breeding, by practicing judicious selection, and by applying proper methods of feeding our livestock may be rapidly and markedly improved in quality regardless of whether improvement is sought in milk production, in wool production, in the production of carcass, or in the development of speed or draft. Quality and not merely increase in numbers should be the aid of all livestock breeding.

County Agents in Maryland

The County Agent is familiar with the agricultural conditions of the county in which his field of work lies. He knows the soil and crop adaptations, is acquainted with the livestock activities of the county, and in many ways is in a position to render a valuable service to the farmers of the county and state. County Agents are often in a position to make known to breeders and feeders where a surplus of livestock, feed, etc., exists and thus assist in getting buyers and sellers together, so that a "sale" may be made or a "want" relieved. A list of the county agents in Maryland, together with their addresses and the counties which they serve, is therefore given in order that the livestock breeders of the state may know to whom to write for information respecting local conditions in their own or other counties of the state.

National Breed Associations with the names and addresses of their Secretaries.

Breeders who are interested in any particular breed or breeds of livestock may secure information relative to the origin, history, development, characteristics, adaptability, registration, etc., by writing to the secretaries of the various breed associations.

A breeder of pure-bred livestock should, for various reasons, belong to the association in which he registers his animals. The first reason for becoming a member is that by so doing the registration fee is reduced, a factor of considerable importance when herds are large. The reduction in the registration fee will, within a short time, pay the fee for membership. A second reason for membership is that each added member strengthens the association and gives greater power to its actions. A third advantage of membership is that a member will take greater interest in the breed in general, in the use to which money expended by the association is put in furthering the advancement of the breed, and in exhibits of livestock at the various fairs and shows.
